BONN, Nov. 11—The 30 to 40 radical leftists in the Baader-Meinhof gang have succeeded, through a hunger strike in which one of them died Saturday, in dramatizing their two-and-a-half-year pretrial imprisonment.

The main trial of the anarchists, whose sympathizers are also being blamed in the press for the assassination of Judge Günter von Drenkmann in Berlin last night, is not expected until "sometimes next year" in Stuttgart, the Justice Ministry says.

The nucleus of the gang, which called itself the "Red Army Faction" and took responsibility for bombings that killed four American soldiers and wounded 30 persons in May of 1972, numbers 17. Holger Meins, who died in a hospital prison Saturday, at the age of 33, was one. The rest of those being held are said to be helpers or sympathizers.

In the wake of the killing of Mr. von Drenkmann, president of West Berlin's highest court, special protection was ordered for all judges and prosecutors. Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, who was in West Berlin for a political rally today, was guarded closely.

And in the light of Mr. Meins's death, judicial authorities appointed a commission of doctors to examine the other members of the gang to see if they, too, were in danger.

Mr. Meins's lawyer, Otto Schily, visited him last week in jail in Wittlich, not far from Bonn. The lawyer said yesterday that he had warned the authorities that Mr. Meins, who was being fed intravenously, was in mortal danger.

Interior minister Werner Maihofer went to West Berlin today and offered a $20,000 reward for information on the half-dozen persons who shot Judge Von Drenkmann at the door of his apartment last night.

Mr. Schily said yesterday that Ulrike Meinhof, 39, a former journalist who says she founded the gang's Red Army faction, is also weak from going without food.

She was arrested in Hanover on June 16, 1972, and is being held in Berlin for a separate trial on charges of conspiring to help Andreas Baader 31, escape from jail in 1970.

Protest in West Berlin

BERLIN, Nov. 11 (Reuters)—The police used batons, tear gas and water cannons tonight to scatter more than 5,000 demonstrators protesting the death of the anarchist Holger Meins in prison, where he had been on a hunger strike.

The battle, in West Berlin's fashionable Kurfürstendamm, occurred less than 24 hours after the killing last night of Judge Günter von Drenkmann. A police spokesman said the rally had been forbidden and that the demonstrators threw stones, smashed store windows and looted some stores.
